Love Used To Be

Jewel

Love used to be the ruler from which you measured all Love used to be the dizzying height from which you wished to fall Love used to be the white and gauzy apparition towering in your dreams

Love used to be

Love used to be

Love used to be the horseshoe made of iron and always smiling up And in your arms it gathered all manner of silky satin golden luck Love used to be the pyramid and on top its eye that always sees

Love used to be

Love used to be

Dig a six-foot hole inside my chest Heart like a gravestone lay it down to rest

Goodbye love

Amen

Love used to be a sigh like petals gently falling down From the flower of my lover's half-open rose-bud mouth Love used to be the thirst and the quenching, the question in no need of answering

Love used to be

Love used to be

Love used to be hope unflinching, a dare that believed it must Love used to be the heady drunken feeling of flesh heavy with lust Love used to be a photograph of the future taken by one mind,

four eyes could see

Love used to be

Love used to be

Dig a six-foot hole inside my chest Heart like a gravestone lay it down to rest

Goodbye love

Amen

Love used to be a miracle, the proof that God exists
As it doubled our image, immortality delivered by the double helix Love used to be the bedrock you built a life upon, into the future reaching
It used to be what woke you each day and eased me into sleeping Love used to be my compass, but now I'm alone and I'm adrift and I'm lost at sea

Because love used to be

Love used to be

Love used to be
