

All the Faces

Creed Bratton

I saw a friend today, it had been a while.
And we forgot each others names.
But it didn't matter cause deep inside
The feelings still remained the same.

We talked of knowing one before you've met,
And how you feel more than you see,
And other worlds that lie in spaces in between,
And angels you can see.

And all the faces that I know
Have that same familiar glow.
I think I must've known then somewhere once before
All the faces that I know.

All the faces that we see each and every day
When I get home at night, you're the face I need.

And when my mind's absorbed on my private little screen,
And I'm walking blind through a sea of unknown men,
I hear a voice reminding there across the street
Walks an old forgotten friend.

We don't have to say a word.
It's really better left unsaid.
Just like through eyes that recognize
All the faces that I know.
All the faces that I know.

All the faces that we see each and every day
When I get home at night, you're the face I need.
When I get home at night, you're the only face I need.
