The Seer

Big Country

Long ago I beard a tale I never wilt forget The time was in the telling On the bank the scene was set The sky was rolling blindly on The daylight had not gone She washed her hair among the stones And saw what was to come All this will pass There will be blood among the corn And heroes in the hills But there is more to come my boy Before you've had your fill Men will come and rope the sail As though it were their own And they will bathe their feet in oil As I have bathed my own All this will pass All things must come Just as I tell you here Stones will stand together As if searching for the stars And all come crashing down again Before they reach too far She turned to face the setting sun I turned to walk away But then she called my name again And beckoned me to stay All this will pass All things must come

Just as I tell you here
She told me of the famous sons
Who write their names in peace
Yet be cut down before the time
Has come for our release
Just as I tell you here
Even now
I wait for the coming day

Even now She waits in the dawn For the tales she tells For the gifts that she will sell For the sight she knows For a vision that still grows With the dream in her eyes no one's seen I listened for so long that day That I can hardly tell If what she said was heaven sent Or brought to bear in hell That men of hope would stand alone And still be cast a lie Just as Romans cast them On the day they were to die All this will pass There is more of what she told Much better left alone For who are we to question her Who stands among the stones
